Sidney Smith on Soups.

I was at Bowood last week (writes Smith), and the only persons there were Calcott and his wife—two very sensible, agreeable people. Luttrell came over for the day. He was very agreeable, but spoke too lightly, I thought, of veal soup. I took him aside and reasoned the matter with him, but in vain; to speak the truth, Luttrell is not steady in his judgment on dishes. Individual failures with him soon degenerate into generic objections, till, by fortunate accident, he cats himself into better opinions. A person of more calm reflection thinks not only of what he is consuming at that moment, I was at Bowood last week (writes what he is consuming at that moment, but of the soups of the same kind he has met with in a long course of dining, and which have gradually and justly elevated the species. I am, perhaps, making too much of this, but the failures of a man of sense are always-painful.—Caterer. ways-painful. - Caterer.
